Every season has its stand-out fashion trends. And this year it was undoubtedly all about the protest t-shirt. From festivals to bars, catwalks to demonstrations, it seems that everyone is wearing one. Even leading fashion house Dior sent models down the runway wearing political t-shirts, declaring ‘We should all be feminists’.

CND was of course ahead of the curve! Sales of our Katharine Hamnett designed ‘NHS not Trident’ t-shirts have soared over the last few years, as our supporters use the opportunity to make their views about spending money on nuclear weapons known. In a year when politics has seemed more extreme than usual, is the slogan t-shirt an opportunity to make a personal stand?

Clothing has been used as a form of protest throughout history. Suffragettes wore white to symbolise purity and during the March on Washington in 1963, black women wore denim overalls to mark their commitment to civil rights and supporters of the pro-democracy. Even a lack of clothing can make a point; recall the PETA ‘We’d Rather Go Naked Than Wear Fur’ campaign adverts.

CND supporter Vivienne Westwood was designing protest t-shirts in the 1970s, but perhaps the most famous statement t-shirt moment of all came in the 1980s when Katharine Hamnett attended an event with then Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher in 10 Downing Street. She chose to wear a top with the slogan ‘58% don’t want Pershing’, a reference to Thatcher’s decision to allow US nuclear-armed missiles.
to be stationed in Britain despite the majority of the public being opposed.

In an interview with The Guardian newspaper, Hamnett has said “That t-shirt gave me a voice… Slogans work on so many different levels; they’re almost subliminal. They’re also a way of people aligning themselves to a cause. They’re tribal. Wearing one is like branding yourself.”

But why do more people feel this need to ‘brand oneself’ right now? The election of President Trump has galvanised people that may not have been involved with protest before. It’s been apparent at anti-Trump events that CND has attended in 2017 that people are turning up to demonstrations for the first time, following his shocking statements and actions on subjects as diverse as immigration, sexism, trans rights, climate change and peace. In the UK, Brexit has had a similar effect in politicising new swaths of people.

CND’s membership is certainly increasing and our t-shirts are extremely popular, as CND’s Fundraising Officer (with responsibility for CND’s merchandise) Ilanga Preuss explains. “CND’s t-shirts are really popular – sales are doing well and we’re seeing more and more people wear them to demos. When the NHS not Trident t-shirts were first designed, they sold out very quickly.

The message really resonated with people. Many people regard the NHS highly and recognise it as a vital service — some will have a deep personal connection to it. When the NHS staff strikes began last year, the t-shirts’ popularity grew again — people wanted to show their support for health professionals while also highlighting the practical and moral issues around prioritising funding for nuclear weapons.”

There are many benefits to CND from people wearing our t-shirts. “Many people have told us that the slogan t-shirts are excellent conversation starters — strangers will approach them to discuss nuclear weapons, which is brilliant for the campaign. In this way, CND t-shirts get our message out into public spaces that we can’t reach with traditional communications, like print or even social media,” says Ilanga.

It’s fantastic for CND to see people identify themselves so boldly as supporters of the organisation, so let’s make the most of the trend. We have a feeling our members will be wearing their t-shirts with pride even after they’ve slipped off the pages of the fashion magazines.
would be the key technical, institutional, legal and political steps that Britain needs to undertake in order to join and implement this treaty?

There are many questions to answer. Looking at the prohibitions and provisions in the new treaty, there will need to be processes and timelines for transferring warheads from RNAD Coulport to AWE Burghfield, the dismantlement and disposal of nuclear, explosive and other relevant components, taking into account environmental and safety requirements, eventually disarming and disposing of all the nuclear weapons in the UK arsenal. What will be the implications for industries that currently make components for British warheads and the Dreadnought submarines? How would accession to the treaty affect jobs in key facilities such as AWE Aldermaston and Burghfield, Faslane naval base, RNAD Coulport, and Barrow shipyards?

What, in other words, needs to be done to enable this country to transition from being a nuclear-armed state wasting billions on Trident replacement to one that leads the way towards full compliance with international nuclear disarmament obligations?

CND will be examining these issues and proposing answers in a Transition Study, set to be published in 2018. We are bringing together international and British experts in the field to build on previous studies. We’ll look at research by the International Panel on Fissile Materials and learn lessons from post-war nuclear reductions and South Africa’s elimination of its arsenal and weapons-making capabilities before it joined the Non-Proliferation Treaty in 1991.

The Transition Study will show that the UK can and must sign the global ban treaty. Our aim is that it encourages politicians and policymakers to take the ban seriously and start planning for when the UK joins, as it assuredly will, sooner or later. We also want to prompt policymakers to think about how to manage the transition in ways that maximise security and safety, and prepare the industries and workforce that are currently relying on making, deploying and modernising nuclear weapons for new roles and jobs, through defence diversification, reskilling and repurposing of relevant facilities.

Isle of Wight CND had a busy 2017. The group met their MP, attended Glastonbury Festival and were interviewed by a local radio station to discuss the history of CND, its local work and the group’s role in the campaign. But they saved their best action until last! To celebrate the 2017 Nobel Peace Prize being awarded to ICAN for its work on the global nuclear weapons ban, the group arranged for an advert to be placed on a huge billboard on a busy road. This large reminder of why we should be getting rid of nuclear weapons is seen by hundreds, if not thousands, of people every day – great work!

CND would like to wish all our supporters a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year!

Every year has its ups and downs but this year has seemed even more extreme than usual! The election of Trump and North Korea’s missile tests have increased international nuclear tension, while the UN adopted a global nuclear weapons ban, the most positive step for nuclear disarmament in decades.

2017 has therefore been at times difficult, but at other times so encouraging. Thank you to all our supporters for your hard work throughout it all! We look forward to working with you in 2018 to make the world a secure and safe place – free of the threat of a nuclear holocaust.
